Comments for Public Posting: Marilyn Monroe was an American icon known throughout the world despite her short life and career. Her Brentwood house was the only real estate she ever owned, and represents a rare bastion of stability for a woman who spent her childhood in an orphanage and foster care. Her house is also a part of not just California or Los Angeles/Hollywood history, but American history. The mantra of all historic preservation is that once something is demolished it can never be rebuilt, as a facsimile isn't the same thing as the genuine, authentic structure. Please designate Marilyn Monroe's house as a Cultural-Historic Landmark.

Comments for Public Posting: Marilyn's House is historically important because it is the only house she owned in her lifetime. Marilyn is still an uplifting role model for many people today. Her movies and personality help me get through tough times in my life. Her acting career and legacy put Hollywood on the map and draws tourists around the world. She is the most beautiful and sweetest woman in Hollywood History. Her house needs to be turned into a museum like the Anne Frank House in Amsterdam since it helped gather Marilyn fans from around the world come together and for the people who knew her. For the past month, I had dreams with Marilyn and felt happy to be reunited with her since I was lucky enough to know her as a person and I still miss her to this day. Losing Marilyn's house will be a devastating blow for Marilyn fans and it will break my heart since it feels like losing a piece of her. The owners need to sell the house and use the money to relocate it and buy a newly built larger house in a different neighborhood.

Comments for Public Posting: In one building you have the history of Los Angeles architecture (a 95yo Spanish Colonial revival style unique to Los Angeles and Southern California), and the history of a Hollywood icon. Hollywood is the land of story tellers. What story would it tell if the LA City Council allowed, even blessed, tearing down the only house that Marilyn Monroe purchased? The MM house should be saved as a landmark, and it would to help write a positive chapter in our fair city's story.

Comments for Public Posting: If anyone's home in L.A. should be landmarked, it's the Brentwood home of Marilyn Monroe. As an Angeleno who was born and raised in precarious circumstances, then managed against staggering odds to become an icon of the movie business, and attained that elusive goal of being a Hollywood star, Ms Monroe life reflects the very essence of the California dream. The only home she ever owned is an important part of the city's history and landmarking is the kind of honor and tribute this home deserves.
