I write to you as a native Angeleno and as a woman, as well as the Director of the Heritage Conservation graduate program in the USC School of Architecture. There are very few landmarks in the City of Los Angeles specifically related to women's history. This site, architecturally modest though it may be, speaks to an important moment in the fight for women's rights and equality in both Los Angeles and the United States. This place was a site of healing, of education, of care, and of community. There is no question that this site meets the criteria for designation as an Historic-Cultural Monument. Especially now, in light of the recent rollback of women's rights all across the U.S., but most especially in Texas, we need to remember -- to remember the fight for women's rights, and to stand up for the places where that fight was joined. I strongly urge you to support the women of Los Angeles by supporting this nomination.
